Teaching behavior analysts and other human services practitioners how to prepare for and present at interdisciplinary meetings may positively affect shared decision making and problem solving, thereby potentially improving consumer educational and treatment outcomes.

Page 1

The present study found that BST improved the preparation and presentation skills of interdisciplinary human services practitioners at team meetings to enhance communication, achieve the objectives of following a standardized review process, and demonstrate a model for individuals trained outside of behavior analysis.

Page 10